

Great start here! I see you have the sections and the information that will belong in the section. Make sure the formatting is following MLA: <https://library.menloschool.org/mla>

Remember the final paper should have these sections:

Introduce readers to your subject and why it matters.

Review the ongoing research conversation and position your own investigation within that conversation. This should have all 4 to 5 secondary sources.

Review of literature.

In this roughly 150-300 words (though longer is fine) review of literature, you are presenting your understanding of the current state of the research “conversation” you found while conducting secondary research. Your focus here should be on synthesizing rather than summarizing the various sources; you summarized them already in your annotations. If certain sources stand out in your mind as being more important than others, be sure that comes across in your discussion.

Explain how you conducted your investigation.

Present data and findings in order to create a picture of how writing is used in the particular context in which you studied it.

Present specific evidence.

Analyze this data and make claims about writing based on what you've learned.

Draw conclusions and suggest further research possibilities generated by your investigation.

Make sure you post visuals and screenshots to show your data. An article by itself does not work there should be evidence of what you collected to come to your conclusion. It can all be in your appendix. When you quote from your research make sure to give credit to the participant.
